Schlage encode - terrible user experience!

Just got the new matte black schlage encode. Was shocked to discover that the user experience is terrible. You can't see the numbers at all until you've pressed at least one of them. But when you press the keypad it accepts whichever number you press as the first digit of the code. Which means you've already started entering the wrong code. The only way to successfully enter the code is to first press the lower left-hand section of the keypad, which is totally unmarked, then the keypad lights up and you can enter the code. Maybe if this was not for an Airbnb, you would get used to this fact as an owner and it would be fine, but for Airbnb guests, I can only imagine this is going to be horribly confusing. I think the previous model allowed you to actually see the digits before pressing the keypad.

Is anyone else facing this problem? Any workarounds I am unaware of?

Hit the word Schlage at the top first. That turns on the lights and also acts as a clear button for any mistakes.

Nope, not on the newer model. See comments below

I know right!?

It's my biggest complaint too. I just always make sure to leave our front porch lights on. But I agree it's a terrible design feature.

I have the exact same keypad and honestly, I don't know what to tell you. If you're not able to figure out where 1,2,3,4,5,6,7,8,9,0 go on a keypad after god-know how many years of using phones, there may be bigger issues. 🤖

I've had 2 of them on AirBnbs for a couple years. I just put in my instructions to hit the logo first, no issues.

guests can't even guess to touch the lower left hand corner of the pad ring, or I could put a note sticker there — for a lock that is this price though, I should not have to.

Got the new silver one today. Wow what a difference. You can see them side-by-side here. Highly recommend using the silver model.

We have the same lock and have the same issue. While I've never personally had issues guest upon initial entry seem to have problems maybe 30% of the time. Originally we gave them very specific instructions to try and eliminate the issue. But we all know guest can't follow instructions well. The issue is just a problem with the colors. Black on black in a darkish area is a problem. Solution for us was to switch to one of the silver ones. Visibility is improved and most of our unlock issues have gone away.

This... thank you! Just issued a return for the old lock and got one of the silver ones. Wow I just cannot believe that Schlage got this wrong.

If you press the Schlage logo first... the entire pad lights up.

Not on the newer models. You have to touch the little house icon in the lower left... Which is also invisible until the keypad lights up. It is a serious WTF.

I've got the light keypad on the Encode Camelot on two condos and never had a problem with the guests. Other than the hard-to-read keypad, these locks are great (had a fast discharge problem once, but it never happened again).

Definitely return it for a silver one. The black on black seems like a bad color choice on their end.

I still have your problem at night though. You can't see see the keypad in the dark unless you press one of the buttons first. Since I'm the host I know to press the lower left hand button first so it lights up. But I'd imagine guests will certainly press a random number on the keypad then get confused when the keypad rejects their input on what seems to be the 3rd out of 4 digits. I don't have a solution for it.

Yeah, I am anticipating problems at night. I have set up a dusk-till-dawn porch light, but not sure if it will be sufficient. I will just have to emphasize it in instructions when I provide the PIN and we'll see how it goes. I was also thinking maybe I could put a white or reflective round sticker in the lower left on top of the house icon -- but it sure would be ugly :-)

Is there any reason why you don't switch it out for the silver one at least? Yeah it'll be a hassle uninstalling it and reinstalling but it'll def save you some headache on the future. Because with the silver one it works perfectly in the daylight.

Oh sorry forgot to mention I already did that - def solves the problem during the day.
